Chamberlain Hrdlicka's New Leader Sees 'Momentum' At Firm, Law360 Pulse

Law360 Pulse

February 9, 2026

Law360 Pulse recently published an article recapping an interview with Chamberlain Hrdlicka's new managing shareholder, Larry Carbo, highlighting the firm's leadership elevations and growing momentum. In the piece, Carbo outlines plans to expand into new markets, launch additional practice groups and continue building on the firm's strong foundation.

"I tell recruits and laterals that they're walking into a firm that has a number of shareholders who have not yet hit their peaks—they're on their way up, they've got years to go," Carbo said. "We're growing with the right people in place."

When asked about the prospect of expanding into additional locations, Carbo explained, "Our primary target right now is Austin, and I think we will have an office there by the end of the year. We already have a very good intellectual property section, and Austin is a good market for that. We have a few lawyers that work out of our San Antonio office but are based in Austin, so we're already expanding into that market."

He continued, "We also want to grow our Philadelphia office, which is primarily tax everything from tax controversy, to tax planning, to state and local tax issues."

Carbo shared with Law360 Pulse how the firm approaches hiring new talent and what leadership is prioritizing moving forward. He said, "We are really proud of our clerkship program and have a number of attorneys who started as associates and are equity shareholders now. It's a great place to have good work opportunities and experience in an environment that supports you."
