Miami Managing Partner John Meagher was recently quoted in an article entitled "South Florida Attorneys Rethink Strategy Amid State, Federal Court Litigation Surge," published by the Daily Business Review. John primarily represents insurance companies in state and federal courts, both of which are experiencing an uptick in trial activity.

As a sign of this increased activity, John cited two trial victories he secured in the single month of March.

"Quickly making up for the dearth of trials as a result of the pandemic," John said, "my trial team notched two federal court trial wins this month, both of which involved disability insurance issues."

However, John noted that the pace at which the judges in state and federal courts have cleared the dockets might not be sustainable. For example, he said having two trials a month, every month, could backfire in areas such as discovery disputes.

He pointed out that if the judge allowed an 18-month discovery period, it could take both sides 18 months to complete discovery; however, if the judge limited the discovery period to just six months, the parties may be compelled to compress document production, interrogatories and witness depositions into that shorter period of time, creating complications in time management.

"We all have to stay sane because discovery involves a lot of arguing and fighting," John added. "Sometimes, it's not easy to keep that pace."
