Paul J. Scheck, a partner in the Orlando office of Shutts & Bowen LLP, was recently quoted in an article by the Society for Human Resource Management (SHRM) addressing the employee-relations considerations of altering vacation travel policies amid COVID-19 exposure concerns.

The article addresses the legal limitations employers face with the off-duty conduct of vacationing employees, especially as it concerns vacation requests for travel to known COVID-19 hot spots. It explains that employers should consider amending vacation policies to require pre-travel inquiries, as well as travel advisories for employees to sign acknowledging the possibility of required self-quarantine upon return. Featuring input from Labor and Employment attorneys across the country, the article also discusses employer considerations for clear communication with employees and health screenings.

Addressing travel to hot spots, Paul offers insight on amending vacation policies to require employees to disclose details of their travel plans and transportation, bringing company laptops in the event self-quarantine is necessary and addressing options for telecommuting should that be the case. According to Paul, "Any such amendment to an employer's current vacation policy should be clearly communicated to employees in advance."
